Executive Summary

Canadian Investor Research Executive Summary

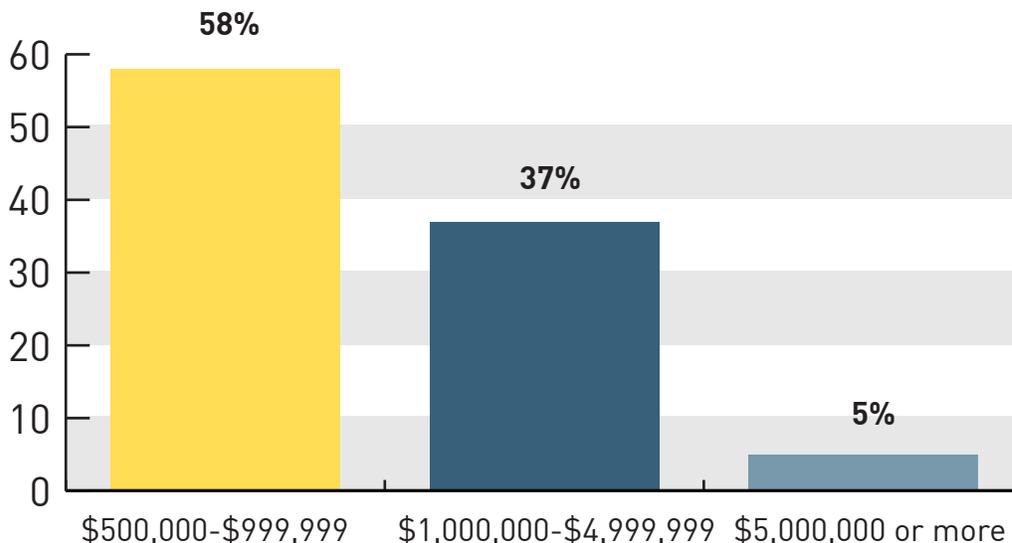

When it comes to the strength of the relationships between advisors and their clients, the news is good. In a recent study, commissioned by the Investments & Wealth Institute, and sponsored by Capital Group, 93 percent of high net worth clients said they were somewhat (25 percent) or very (68 percent) satisfied with their advisor and 92 percent said they were somewhat (24 percent) or extremely (68 percent) likely to continue to work with their advisor.

And while those results are clearly positive, it begs a question. What can advisors do to stand out when high satisfaction and loyalty do not set them apart. This study, conducted by AbsoluteEngagement.com on behalf of the Investments & Wealth Institute, examines if and how advanced, voluntary designations or credentials supported meaningful differentiation among advisors.

The Research

The over-arching goal of the research was to gain deeper insight into the role that advanced designations and credentials play in supporting credibility and advisor selection. The research also examined the type and depth of information investors want to have regarding designations and if and how that was communicated.

Data was gathered from 444 high net worth investors in Canada and 585 high net worth investors in the United States, via online survey between August 7 - August 15, 2017. This summary provides insight from the 444 Canadian respondents. More specifically, the sample is comprised of investors who work with a financial advisor (across channel) and make or contribute to the financial decision making in the household. Focusing on total investable assets, the sample breaks down as follows and a detailed participant profile is included at the end of this summary.

Q: Please tell us which best describes your current total investable assets.

Key Findings

1. High net worth clients believe in the importance of advanced, voluntary education for their advisors.

The data clearly shows that clients believe their advisor should go above and beyond what is required to sharpen their technical skills. Seventy-five percent of high net worth clients wanted to know their advisor had done more than meet the minimum educational requirements to become registered or licensed. For some (49 percent) that meant they wanted their advisor to participate in voluntary courses from time to time and for others (26 percent) that meant obtaining advanced certifications.

When thinking about credentials, high net worth clients were clear on what was most important to them. When asked about the importance of various aspects of obtaining a certification, three characteristics rose to the top.

- Eighty-nine percent of clients said knowing their advisor would lose his/her credentials if he/she failed to meet ethics standards was somewhat or very important.
- Eighty-nine percent of clients said knowing their advisor had met ongoing standards in order to maintain his/her credentials (e.g., annual continuing education, adherence to ethical standards) was somewhat or very important.
- Eighty-eight percent of clients said knowing their advisor had met a rigorous set of standards to be certified (e.g., ethics, experience, education, examinations) was somewhat or very important.

2. Advanced certifications will be increasingly important to advisor selection in future.

Canadian investors are changing when it comes to what they are looking for in an advisor and the future will be about designations. Only thirteen percent of clients said they actively sought out an advisor with specific designations. Among that group of clients who said they sought out an advisor with specific designations, two thirds said they would not have worked with the advisor if he/she did not hold those designations. However, nearly three times as many US investors (35 percent) said they looked for specific designations.

With 50 percent of respondents having worked with their advisor for 10 years or more, gauging the importance of designations/certifications in advisor selection can be difficult. Looking forward, however, 72 percent of clients said that designations/certifications would be somewhat (49 percent) or very (23 percent) important if they were looking for a new advisor today.

3. High net worth clients believe that advanced expertise sets their advisor apart.

In addition to supporting credibility, many clients believe that having advanced certifications sets their advisor apart in a competitive marketplace. Forty-four percent of respondents said they somewhat (27 percent) or completely (17 percent) agreed that the designations or credentials held by their advisor set him or her apart from other advisors. Based on the data in the previous section, this number will likely increase over time.

4. High net worth clients want a deeper understanding of their advisor's designations.

Advisors have a real opportunity to help clients understand the designations/certifications they hold and what those designations mean. While 56 percent of clients say they are somewhat (25 percent) or very (31 percent) comfortable with their current level of understanding of the designations held by their advisor, 40 percent say they would like a better understanding. It appears that anything short of a very high level of understanding creates a desire to learn more. US investors tend to have a greater comfort level in their understanding of designations, with 71 percent saying they were somewhat (29 percent) or very (42 percent) comfortable with their level of knowledge.

The level of understanding of designations/credentials mirrors the self-reported level of general investment knowledge. Forty percent of clients report that they are very knowledgeable about investing and another 10 percent report that they are extremely knowledgeable. Clients who rate themselves as knowledgeable about investing are more likely to rate their level of understanding of designations higher. In general, US investors self-report much higher levels of investment knowledge.

There is an interesting correlation between self-reported investment knowledge and referrals. Sixty-two percent of clients who provided a referral indicated they were somewhat/extremely knowledgeable, dropping to 44 percent among those who did not provide a referral.

5. It's not just the designation but what it represents.

The importance of designations and certifications reflects what is most important to clients generally. When asked about what was most important in a relationship, trust, knowledge and ethics rank highest. The Investments & Wealth Institute believes that these characteristics are best demonstrated through voluntary and advanced credentials/designations.

When asked to rate the importance of various elements of the advisory relationship, clients rated the following highest from a longer list of items. The chart shows the percentage of clients who rated as a 5 out of 5 on importance.

Working with an advisor who is trustworthy	92%
Working with an advisor who is knowledgeable	89%
Working with an advisor with high ethical standards	87%
Being comfortable with the level of risk in my portfolio	86%
Working with an advisor who fully understands my financial needs	82%
Being satisfied with my long-term investment performance/returns	80%

Age plays an important role in how clients rate the importance of specific aspects of the relationship.

- In general clients who are under 50 are more neutral, rating most aspects of the relationship within a narrow range and generally placing less emphasis on any single aspect of the relationship than older clients.
- Older clients are likely to have extremes in what they perceive as important or unimportant.
- Younger clients (under 50) place relatively less emphasis on ethics and relatively more emphasis on working with an advisor who helps them maintain a long-term approach to investing and who helps them stay calm if the market drops.

6. Communication is a missing link

There is no doubt that advisors invest significant time, money and energy in achieving advanced expertise through designations and credentials. Yet only 30 percent of clients report that their advisor proactively shared details on those designations with them.

More striking is the correlation between client engagement (comprised of satisfaction and referral activity) and proactive communication around designations or credentials. Forty-four percent of engaged clients said their advisor had proactively shared information on designations/credentials, dropping to 25 percent among those who were not engaged.

It is for this reason that the Investments & Wealth Institute is investing in developing a program to help members to communicate with clients through the right message, at the right time and with the right amount of depth. The program draws on in-depth information gathered in this study and will be formally unveiled at the Investments & Wealth Institute Annual Conference Experience on May 6-9, 2018. www.investmentsandwealth.org

7. Clients place greatest value on investment management.

When asked about the services they receive, the highest percentage of clients say their advisor provides investment management strategies (66 percent) and support on maximizing income in retirement (65 percent).

When asked what they are paying their advisor to do for them, clients responded as follows:

Investment Management	61%
Financial Planning	40%
Wealth Management	33%
Retirement Solutions	25%

When asked, instead, to rank the importance of these four types of support/services provided, Canadian investors placed higher importance on wealth management than on financial planning, suggesting a untapped demand for wealth management. The following shows the percentage of clients rating each area as the most important, based on a ranking from one through four.

Investment Management	36%
Wealth Management	25%
Financial Planning	20%
Retirement Solutions	18%
